IS PEEL REGION

Picking on the poor people?

Members of Peel Region's Human Services are on strike. So are members of the Public Works department which makes sure our water is safe to drink, and TransHelp, which provides transportation to people with disabilities.

Strikers claim that the employer – ostensibly the Region of Peel, but really us, the voters – are not offering a fair deal to union members.

Worse than that, they say that the people we elected to represent us on Peel Regional Council have chosen to dish out the worst mistreatment to those who are trying to help Peel's poorest residents.

Peel's Human Services Department staffs Ontario Works. Their job is to give monthly cheques to people who have exhausted their Employment Insurance, cashed their RRSPs, and are desperate for help.

These same strikers are also Outreach Workers, the on-the-ground group that visits Peel's soup kitchens to make sure everyone who needs help gets it, and to scoop homeless people into some sort of shelter on those killing cold or threateningly fatal hot nights. They save lives.

Outreach worker Ruth Renwick (in the Canada top hat) usually spends her time helping people who are homeless. Now she's on the picket line with other social service workers who won't agree to wage and working conditions that they consider unfair. The picketers gather outside the Region of Peel offices on Hurontario north of Derry in Mississauga. Also in the picture: Denise Reja, Julia Chambers, Brain Purdy, Patricia Kovar, Tina Walzak, Tracy Cicerelli, Lenora Hopkins, Tara Dubreuil-Pocnic, Trisha Waechter, Pam Bilkhu, Taryn Hawley-Pitt. (Staff photo)

The mostly-female employees in the Ontario Works segment of Local 966 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees claim that the employer (that's us again) has set them up.

Here's what they say: Any non-union employee of the Region of Peel gets a two per cent raise this year, possibly up to nine per cent if the worker faces a performance appraisal process. Benefits remain in place.

But initially, CUPE members were offered no raise at all. Even with revised offers, they stand to lose about $300 a year through changes in benefits.

Local 966 sees Peel Region as taking a step towards getting rid of unions. Not because union members don't do a good job, but because unions can insist on fair treatment in the workplace.

CUPE members believe, too, that Peel Region is following the example of the federal government in cutting down citizens – reducing Employment Insurance, legislating union members back to work, even insisting that future pensioners work until they are 67 instead of 65, even though right now anybody over 60 is hardpressed to find a job.

As voters in Peel Region, we are the employer. And we are the government. We want all our citizens to be well-paid and fairly treated.

We want them to be secure in their jobs and income now and in future. That's better for them, better for us, better for business.

Tell that to your local councillor.

Disabilities Fair at LAC

If you are having trouble finding a job today, think how much more difficult your job hunt would be if you had a disability.

The foyer of Mississauga's Living Arts Centre was packed recently when the Coalition for Persons with Disabilities held a Connections Resource Fair.

Its purpose was to show people who have a disability what is available to help them and to show the public why such resources are needed, and how to use them.

The Coalition began in Peel nearly 30 years ago when groups helping people with disabilities realized they could avoid duplication and give more help to more people by working together.

Among the services provided to 1175 people last year:

- Employment Access – a service helping persons with disabilities to prepare for, obtain and maintain jobs;
- Employment PAH! Workshop -- designed specifically for individuals who are deaf or hard of hearing but fluent in American Sign Language, to learn fundamental employability skills;

- Work Readiness for Youth includes a paid eight-week employment skills workshop, followed by seven weeks at work;
- Student Transition Program is a partnership with the Peel District School

Board to help students with disabilities get jobs;

- Accessible Customer Service Workshops help organizations understand and comply with the Accessibility for Ontarians with Disabilities Act.

CUPE 966: PEEL'S FIRST LINE OF DEFENCE

Are the union picket lines outside Region of Peel buildings a line of defence against cuts in old age pensions, cuts in health care, cuts in Employment Insurance?

Trade union members, and many others, think they are.

Labour accuses Canada's federal government of making war on unions — they claim that back-to-work legislation interferes with fair negotiations between employers and workers, that changes in the rules applied to temporary foreign workers will result in exploitation, that mass firing of federal civil servants is not so much a money saver as a threat to all workers — and that Ottawa is signalling other levels of government that dumping union workers is OK.

But it's not just unions that the federal government is blasting. Other social supports are being reduced.

While more workers are being fired, the feds are chopping into Employment Insurance. Currently, only four out of ten unemployed people get EI when they need it, even though they have paid into it for years.

Old Age Security and the Guaranteed Income Supplement won't be available until age 67, instead of the current age 65. This take-away is being phased in over 10 years.

As well, funding is being pulled from environmental organizations, who have pointed out the dangers to our air and water from current permissive policies.

The members of Local 966 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees are embroiled not just in a disagreement with Peel Region which has chosen to adopt the federal government's anti-union stance, but in showing to everyone that divisive and un-

Rain came down with a vengeance on Human Service workers' strike rally in Mississauga's Civic Square. But that couldn't stop these employees of Peel Region from beating the drum and making noise about the fact they are on strike to get a fair deal not just for themselves but for all of Peel. (Staff photo) fair policies must be resisted. CUPE is on the picket line for everyone.

And here's a reminder: It was trade unions and the NDP/CCF that persuaded a minority government in the early 1960s to introduce old age pensions, unemployment insurance and universal medical care to Canada — programs that now need protection.

The Human Service workers from Peel Region have one of the most difficult jobs in social services. They try to help people who are struggling, making sure that they get all the allowances to which they are entitled.

The folk they work with and for may be receiving Ontario Works assistance -- as little as $599 a month. This would be a single person (families get more) who is out of work, has exhausted Employment Insurance, has no RRSPs or other source of income. It is a Human Service worker's job to ensure that OW folk receive any extra benefits to which they are entitled, such as a Special Diet allowance, travel and transportation for medical care or job search, any other goodies or responsibilities hidden in the 180 regulations that govern OW.

There are ironies in how governments treat people who are struggling. Poor people in Peel receive less in social assistance than most local councillors get in car allowances.

MPs who chip away at pensions and Employment Insurance get $157,731 a year.

Ontario's provincial government sets the rates for Ontario Works recipients. The folk who decide that $7,200 a year is enough for others to live on, need more for themselves. MPPs' basic pay is $116,000.

Regional councillors who are ultimately responsible for negotiating new contracts with unionized workers are paid $49,428 by the Region of Peel, plus a salary and car allowance by Brampton, Caledon or Mississauga taxpayers.

Brampton Mayor Sue Fennell gets $220,382 a year — $157,168 a year from the City, plus $63,214 from the Region of Peel, plus car allowance of $16,433.

Brampton's six Regional councillors get $125,305 each, plus car allowance of $11,941.

In Mississauga, Mayor Hazel McCallion's pay totals $186,068, plus $10,528 vehicle expenses. Mississauga's councillors get $131,042, plus car allowance of $17,304.

Caledon's Mayor Marolyn Morrison is paid a total of $109,945; Caledon's four Regional councillors receive $76,195 each, and mileage.

Human Services workers currently on the picket line are paid an average $45,000, from which they pay union dues, a form of insurance against exploitation at work.

Councillors bargain for their jobs with us, the voters, at elections. Election campaign expenses -- lawn signs, pamphlets, etc. -- are in large part paid by donations, not exceeding $750 per donor.

Many of the donors are corporations, including developers. Accepting such gifts is a longstanding practice and is not illegal.

Toronto has banned election donations by corporations or trade unions. Mississauga's Governance Committee is examining the issue, and Mayor Morrison is one of only two mayors in Ontario to declare that no councillor should accept donations from developers.

For the record, Mayor Morrison and Coun. Jim Tovey of Mississauga, don't accept developer money. And Mayor McCallion doesn't take campaign money from anybody.

Words from the street

AFFORDABLE TRANSIT

Peel Region wants to reduce poverty. It is working on a strategy to achieve reductions starting this year, and continuing to 2015.

Among the aims is to provide “affordable and accessible transportation” that will move people around Brampton “in an efficient and affordable manner.”

This bike and trailer was built from bits, and belongs to a regular diner at Knights Table. He got the wheels from an abandoned child’s trailer, then added the box.

He’s not contributing to pollution or wearing and tearing away at highway infrastructure.

He is also not threatened by the rising cost of bus fares in Brampton and Mississauga, or the high price of getting to and from other places in the GTA, or getting to job training or interviews, or attending public consultations about transit in Peel. He’s also not concerned with travel subsidies available only to some students and to some folk who remain cash-poor even though they are working.

The bike may get attention when Peel’s Poverty Strategy Committee begins to “research current affordable transit models.”

It might even score a spot on another project the Poverty Strategy folk are looking at: “Partner with a local grocer to create a free or discounted pick-up and drop-off program at the store.”

The ‘Funeral’ label is a joke.

As with most government projects, Peel Region must measure its results. If by 2015, more people who are cash-poor can buy transit passes, then the Poverty Strategy folk will claim success.

Another measure might be to have more cash-poor people using a workshop to build their own bikes.

MEET SOPHIA

Meet Sophia, a Golden Retriever training to be a companion dog. She helps her owner Mientje Reijner of Brampton, to get up and down stairs. Reijner has been training helper and companion dogs for 17 years and says humans are not the only ones hurt by the economic downturns. Pets need help too.

“The loving dogs are filling my loneliness,” says Reijner. “Being poor is difficult, loving is priceless.”

Chris Hatch of Mississauga Food Bank reports his group provides goodies for dogs, cats, birds and small pets like gerbils. At press time, Tough Times had not located a Brampton food bank that includes pet food in its hampers. If you know of one, please contact Knights Table at (905) 454-8725.

ISSUES ON INCOME AND FOOD SECURITY

SPENDING MONEY

Middle – aged woman:

I am a registered nurse, with a Bachelor of Science degree. I used to work at Peel Memorial, but now the hospital hires young people coming out of nurses training programs at lower wages and lets the more experienced people go.

Young man:

Temp agencies put you on a list and it’s two or three months before you are hired. A lot of jobs are general labour, or short-term or part-time. You end up getting about $10 an hour, so a 40-hour week it’s about $400 before deductions. In a month, at least $600 goes to rent (for a room). You need $30 a week for travel and the rest, maybe $500, for all other expenses like food, and clothing. All that depends on full time work. You can’t really save much, so when the job ends you have nothing.

Middle-aged man:

My Ontario Works worker has suspended my file and I am worried that I won’t be able to pay the rent.

It seems they overpaid me a few months back and I didn’t follow up then because I was going through a medical emergency and treatment at that time. I don’t have a phone except a 311 cell phone for medical emergencies. I don’t have enough money to keep using a pay phone. I go to John Howard to use a phone or computer, or I come to the Knights Table to use the phone. I am trying to get in contact with my worker but I have to keep leaving a message. I am pretty stressed about maybe getting kicked out from my place if I can’t pay the rent.

EATING

Grandmother:

You need to be budget conscious and buy items when they come on sale. Knights Table is really good. It bridges the gap.

Middle-aged man:

They get a lot of canned goods here, especially chick peas or beans. You can use chick peas in a lot of different ways. You just mix a little oil, salt, some spices and some chopped vegetables if you have any.

It’s a lot cheaper when you make it yourself than when you buy it ready-made in the store.

Young man:

I have diabetes. I give myself four injections each day. I have to be careful not to get stressed or my blood sugar goes up. I should have lots of fruits and vegetables but I can’t always afford it. I don’t cook when I am by myself because it puts my sugar levels up. Once when I was alone, cooking something, I felt weak, and just turned off the stove in time before I passed out. My roommate came home a couple of hours later and found me and called 911.

Young Mom:

When I come to the food bank I take a taxi to get home with the bags of food. My daughter and I experiment with different recipes depending on what we have. I am teaching her to prepare food in different ways. Did you know that you can keep bread in the freezer for up to nine months? Sometimes we make bread pudding. My daughter really likes it when we put chocolate milk over the bread as a treat.

When a house is not a home

A VISIT TO A HOMELESS SHELTER IN PEEL

BY JESSICA HENWOOD

I have never been without food, or without shelter, or without a family to help me. For some residents of Peel that's not the case. Many people go to soup kitchens and food banks and stay at emergency shelters.

There is no single story about landing in poverty and few of those stories are the stereotypical tales of the lazy bum.

David Carleton, executive director of Salvation Army Residential Services in Peel, is based at a homeless shelter for men in Brampton.

Carleton says that people using the shelter could be doctors, dentists, taxi drivers, a 'United Nations of people' sharing one thing in common: They are broken – spiritually, financially, and in their physical and mental health.

Making the decision to go to a shelter is a last resort. While staff provide basic needs and services, the shelter is a temporary house, not a place to call home.

My visit began after a drive along a nondescript road among unattractive industrial buildings in an ugly part of town. No homes or houses nearby, only concrete and tar macadam unblemished by a blade of grass.

This particular shelter was where single men go when they have nowhere to go. The inside was more like a low security prison with mirrored glass in the front door, dull painted walls in all the rooms, two of them filled with bunk beds – 50 in one room, 20 in another.

Security and safety are a priority

which means that rules are spelled out clearly: no weapons, no booze and no illegal drugs.

Men entering the shelter with addictions may go to the hospital for detox, followed by attempts at rehab.

Other rules include leaving the dormitory room by 8:30 a.m. and returning to the shelter no later than 10 p.m. with lights out by 11 p.m.

Residents are encouraged to look for work and find their own place so they can move out. Within two weeks they must have a plan for leaving, worked out with the shelter's housing officer, whose job is to make and maintain connections with landlords and give residents a list of vacancies.

Though the shelter has room for 70 men, nobody is turned away, even if it means mattresses on the floor. The shelter provides food – breakfast, lunch, dinner, snacks at 8 p.m., a secure locker for each individual, bed and bedding, clothing if required, showers, toiletries, an area to do laundry, five computers, and bus tickets when needed.

Although the list of amenities might seem just enough, some people who are struggling would never go to a shelter, and others dread going back. Staff say that people using the shelter for the first time are terrified just from the fear of the unknown.

When we think about poverty and homelessness we might ask what basic necessities the state should provide. Is the state (that means us) responsible merely for keeping people alive, or does it include ensuring that everyone has a place to call home?

We should work together to provide something better, if only because circumstances can change in an instant. Without a support system of family, friends plus a social safety net, homelessness can become a harsh reality for anyone.

Jessica Henwood is completing an honours BA in Crime and Deviance at University of Toronto – Mississauga.

HELTER SHELTER

BY TOD FOSTER

Support systems – brakes on the speeding, flaming bus down life's twisted highway – come in many forms. Ideally, family, friends and community keep one from careening into the abysmal ditch. Realistically, we might find those brakelines were cut years before. Sabotaged, or faulty right out of the factory.

You may find yourself swerving headlong into dark, soggy fields of disillusion; first upright and then tilted, drifting and finally resting on our sides – uninsured.

The first time I arrived at the Salvation Army shelter in Brampton I was uncertain of what to expect, but certain that park benches were not made for sleeping.

A young naive man trying to process the complexities of these new surroundings – these people in my identical predicament – without a home. The pangs of a tracksuit-garbed youth loudly arguing with himself. The painted face of a man no older than 40, attempting to dial a phone number with perpetually shaking hands and nodding head. The gaze of hatred from one in a corner spitting obscenities at any who pass. Unheeded. Ignored.

I left after the first night, saying to the bemused staff: "There are those here that need this place far worse than I."

I was given a bagged lunch. The first night sleeping in a shelter dorm (13 bunk beds, a room of over 20 men) is likely a sleepless one.

Aware of every peripheral movement, sudden sound and peculiar smell, the morning comes as consciousness ebbs and then the lights snap on. "Everybody up – it's seven o'clock."

Years had passed when I found myself once again walking up to the non-descript single-level building, and this time retreat was not an option. It seldom is for those who have come to the point of breaking down as I had, giving up from one setback too many and out of answers and direction – out of support systems. Worse, I had turned to alcohol and drugs to quell the screaming, crazed sense of dread while plowing headlong through the guardrail and into that metaphorical aforementioned abysmal ditch.

Homeless, foodless, something new

Peel has 15,000 families on a waiting list for homes they can afford. And they may wait 20 years for a place. The numbers of homeless people are growing as well-paid and secure jobs disappear. The numbers using soup kitchens and food banks is on the rise. Two organizations are trying something new to solve these problems.

Pick up Malton homeless, pick up Caledon

MALTON HOMELESS

New efforts have begun in Malton to help people experiencing homelessness.

Job 1: Open a housing registry where landlords can list available places free of charge. The registry began in April, and 46 landlords have already signed on.

It's part of Malton Housing Resource Centre, just opened on the lower level of Westwood Mall specifically to help people experiencing homelessness or about to be homeless. The Centre gets five visitors a day looking for housing or worried about keeping the place they are in.

The alternative is going to a shelter, or sleeping on park benches or in stairwells, or just hanging out in the bush.

Lisa Davis is the Housing Coordinator for the Resource Centre. Part of her job is to contact landlords, keep a list of available housing, help landlords and tenants negotiate leases, encourage both sides to deal with problems immediately, rather than let them fester.

Davis visits listed rooms to confirm that the space is liveable. Knocks on doors to find more accommodation. And she talks with potential tenants about maintaining good relations with the landlord, paying the rent on time, keeping their places clean and tidy.

There's also general advice about surviving homelessness – in summer keep out of the sun; keep cool by using libraries and other air-conditioned places that don't charge for admission; drink plenty of water.

Ensuring that cash-poor people receive the social assistance they are entitled to, such as Ontario Works payments, is also part of Davis' job.

And she hands out flyers (shown below) in Westwood Mall, to make sure that cash-poor people, landlords, and the public, know that help for homelessness is there for the asking.

Middle picture:

Welcoming the new housing for the homeless plan in Malton are Ward Five Coun. Bonnie Crombie, Joyce Templesmith, executive director of Malton Neighbourhood Service, Lisa Davis, newly-appointed housing coordinator for MNS, and Jagmeet Singh, MPP for Bramalea-Gore-Malton.

CALEDON INVESTS IN HEALTH, JOBS, AND NEW IDEAS

Here's a food support program that's more than a food bank.

You can invest in learning a new job, finding out how to eat better, the whole family can discover how to cook better, explore farming, maybe take part in a money-making business.

Caledon Community Services (CCS) is the food financier. It is Caledon's largest health, employment, resettlement, small business development and social service agency, and its food bank plan is part of a homelessness and food strategy.

"For years, CCS has offered a small food hamper program out of a closet within our Bolton home office. No longer," says Michelle Stubbs, Director of Community Resources. "Funding received from the Graham Family Foundation, the United Way of Peel Region and the Region of Peel has helped us."

A 3,600 square-foot building is planned and the hunt is on for Investments and volunteers to help with furnishings and equipment and day-to-day operations.

"This is the right time, after years of planning, to launch this exciting innovation for our community", noted Monty Laskin, CCS Executive Director.

In charge of the project titled Recipe for Resiliency is Kim D'Eri, manager of Poverty Reduction Partnerships for CCS. Her job is to set up the food program and find affordable housing.

Homelessness is a surprise to people in Caledon and outside.

The Town of Caledon has beautiful homes, horse farms, rolling hills and network of walking paths, all the appearances of wealth and prosperity. A closer look reveals many families living in difficult situations where poverty is quite apparent.

Caledon has 150-200 families that rely on crisis and support services every month, and up to six new individuals or families a month seek help because they are homeless or precariously housed.

But they usually can't stay in Caledon, which has little affordable or transitional housing. Families who are struggling may have to relocate in either Orangeville or Brampton, where there are more resources.

Who are Caledon's homeless/precariously housed and where do they come from? The reality is that for the most part, they are people who once had secure housing and have resided in Caledon for most of their lives. Each has their own story to tell; job loss, critical illness, family breakdown, etc. But all with the same outcome of now living in poverty.

CCS is recruiting Caledon families and individuals who have space in their home, a suite in their basement, or a spare house and are willing to rent it out below market. In exchange, CCS will provide support for the tenancy agreement and give the tenant a range of programs to sustain their independence and move them towards self-sufficiency.

Caledon residents who can help contact Kim D'Eri at (905) 584-2300, ext. 202 or kderi@ccs4u.org

Enlightening newspaper

Unfortunately, not enough is done or even said about the catastrophic state of poverty in Peel, or the country for that matter.

This paper gives me hope that the poor and underprivileged are not forgotten. We hope to hear and see more about poverty issues which not only affect those in poverty but also puts a social and economic strain on the entire country.

Fayaz Karim | Mississauga

Unions are better

Congratulations on your inaugural edition. I have worked for various companies since I was 16. I must state personally that when I was a union-supported employee, my work-place environment was the most healthy. I knew I was entitled to two 15-minute breaks and a 30-minute lunch period for every day I worked.

As a non-union-supported employee, I did not have those privileges.

My primary question is: How can prosperity increase while employment decreases? Mass lay-offs of employed people in order to 'decrease costs' can only create more unemployment and poverty. It seems our federal and provincial governments are more interested in selling our natural resources to multi-national corporations overseas.

Debbie Baker

Making a difference

Congratulations to the leadership of Peel Poverty Action Group for initiating this effort to create a greater awareness about poverty in our Region of Peel. This action will engage more community members to get involved in making a difference to those who are in need.

Let's increase the momentum for this movement. Another step in the right direction. Keep up the great work, PPAG.

Move Knights Table back to downtown

Knights Table needs to be central to downtown Brampton, as more needs will be met and downtown is central to most people.

Remove the red tape and allow poverty to be seen so community members can act and address the real issues in our neighbourhood.

Hiding homelessness or stating that poverty does not exist will not make it go away. These are 'tough times' and soup kitchens such as Knights Table need to be accessible for all.

Feed my sheep

I came to Canada in 2009, as a refugee. I love Canada, it is a beautiful and blessed country.

Since November, 2009, I am working as a volunteer at Knights Table.

I love Knights Table and really enjoy working here, serving hungry people, counseling and praying with them.

It is my humble prayer: God bless

Knights Table, staff, clients, and people who support Knights Table.

Jesus said Feed my sheep (John, 21:17) It is our duty to feed His sheep. Then we will be blessed. Amen.

A pant load

I just had my taxes done at and to my delight, I do get a refund, but since I'm 'low income', the government, in their wisdom, has decided to give it to me in monthly installments. I guess it's so I don't blow it all on a necessary major purchase.

I was going to get the muffler on my car fixed, but now I'll have to save up, or use credit and pay interest. I hope I can get back on the road before the end of summer. Thanks a pant load Mr. Flaherty!

Brampton CAW urges a national auto policy

BY LEON RIDEOUT

Canada's auto industry has survived years of turmoil. Despite downsizing, the industry continues to make an immense contribution to Canada's productivity, exports, and to the lives of Canadian families.

Auto jobs continue to face threats from globalization and free trade agreements, apathetic governments, and corporations being more aggressive than ever against workers. The GTA region is a key part of Ontario's auto industry, home to three assembly plants and more than 200 auto parts facilities and the nation's concentration of auto jobs.

Brampton is the home of a major auto manufactory, the Chrysler Assembly Plant which is linked to Benteler Automotive, Oakley Sub Assembly and Syncreon in our community.

The Canadian Auto Workers Union Local 1285 is a proud Local with over 50 years of service in the Brampton community. We have been recognized for our contributions and continuous support to events such as the Brampton Battalion Adopt a School program, Carabram, local parades and financial contributions to a variety of charities such as the Knights Table, Ste. Louise Outreach Centre and United Way of Peel.

Our Local would like to inform the public of the importance of auto jobs in the community of Brampton, the threats facing the auto industry and the CAW's proposal to strengthen auto jobs for the future of all Canadians.

We are currently lobbying all levels of government for the implementation of an Auto Policy and we are asking for the support of the community to protect these important manufacturing jobs in the Province of Ontario.

Parkinson SuperWalk Raising Funds and Awareness

Over 100,000 Canadians suffer from Parkinson's Disease. Parkinson's is a neurodegenerative disease. That means the disease will progress over time, and the symptoms will worsen with age. Currently there is no cure.

People with Parkinson's exhibit various symptoms from tremors, to loss of balance, to stiffness and freezing, to loss of motor control and difficulties speaking. It is with the support and assistance of over 400,000 caregivers and relatives that those with Parkinson's are able to cope with their symptoms and strive to live a normal and healthy life (if only by their standards).

Every year Parkinson Society Canada holds a national event to raise funds to support Parkinson sufferers and their caregivers. But more importantly they raise awareness of the disease so the general public will become aware of those in their midst that are afflicted.

You all know Michael J Fox. But do you know anyone else with Parkinson's?

Please join us on Sunday September 9 at South Fletcher's Sportsplex and to help us raise awareness. You do not need to raise sponsorship money to walk with us. Visit ParkinsonSuperWalk.com for more information.

ISSUES ON SCHOOLS AND TRAVELLING

ON EDUCATION

Middle - aged mom:

When my kids were born I did the planning for university. Now they are in university at York, and Sheridan (psychology and social work). They live at home and get a travel pass, weekly (approx $27) or monthly (approx $130). My oldest daughter just finished dentistry, but she has a $375,000 debt from grad school that she has to pay back. It's a big stress. She is making a payment arrangement.

Young mom:

It's so important for the kids to have a good teacher who likes them but keeps discipline too. I make sure the kids do their homework. They all like reading. The twins are very good at spelling. My younger son likes math best.

ON TRANSPORTATION

Middle-aged mom:

Transit is $3.25 now. It's too expensive. There needs to be a transit pass for those who can't afford it. You need to be able to get around, to the store, to appointments for yourself or your kids.

Young mom:

It really helps to have the food bank at the Knights. I bring bags but everything is too heavy to carry, so my sister helps me. Sometimes a friend with a car is able to drive me.

Why people on welfare are poor

AND WHY THE RICH LIKE IT THAT WAY

BY SIMON BLACK

Who benefits from a miserly welfare system in which rates are set below the poverty line? Ontario's Social Assistance Review Commission has heard from hundreds of social assistance recipients and anti-poverty activists and they have all said the same thing: welfare is broken and needs to be fixed. Rates are too low, rules are too punitive, and the system does more to punish than to help the poor. Yet for government and their rich friends, the welfare system is doing exactly what it was designed to do.

Poor relief, as welfare was originally called, was never designed to be a benevolent handout to the poor. From its roots in England's Poor Laws through to the Harris Conservative's social assistance reforms of the mid-90s, welfare has operated on the principle of "less eligibility." The historic 1834 report on Britain's Poor Laws, issued at the behest of King William IV, stated: "The first and most essential of all conditions, a principle which we find universally admitted, even by those whose practice is at variance with it, is, that his (the relief recipient's) situation on the whole shall not be made really or apparently so eligible (i.e., desirable) as the situation of the independent labourer of the lowest class."

Over 150 years later, the logic remains: The recipient of social assistance should never be better off than the lowest paid wage worker in the labour market. This is exactly what Mike Harris had in mind when his government introduced workfare and cut welfare rates by 21.6 per cent, and why the McGuinty government has done so little to reverse these changes.

Since the early 1990s, Ontario's labour market has been characterized by the growth and persistence of low-wage and insecure jobs, or "precarious employment." One in six workers in the province is making a poverty wage. Whether employed part-time in the fast-food industry or working as a security guard through a temp agency, the growing ranks of the working poor live in a world of labour market insecurity. Many workers cycle between low-wage employment and periods on social assistance, as they don't often have the hours required to qualify for employment insurance.

Business needs these workers to maintain the low-wage-big-profits model of the "Wal-Mart economy" in which the rich get richer and the poor get dead end jobs. And governments across the country are in no mood to provide decent jobs through an expansion of public sector employment, or reverse the deregulation of labour markets that they've so vigorously pursued.

With these shifting trends in employment, welfare functions to ensure a cheap and flexible workforce to populate the lower reaches of the province's labour market. To paraphrase University of British Columbia professor Jamie Peck, welfare today is not about creating jobs for people who don't have them but about creating workers for jobs nobody wants.

Miserly benefit levels, restrictive eligibility criteria and the ritualized stigmatization of those who must navigate the administrative maze that is welfare, are all in keeping with the government's desire to ensure a job at any wage, under any conditions, remains preferable to the receipt of social assistance. The province's tooth-and-nail fight to keep social assistance recipients from having greater access to the special diet program (which they may do away with altogether) is only the latest manifestation of maintaining the principle of less eligibility.

So the rich benefit from a system that pushes the poor into low-wage jobs. Low wages mean bigger profits for those who own and control the majority of wealth. And employed workers who see the treatment doled out to those on social assistance think twice about leaving a bad job for welfare.

So what are poor people and their allies to do when faced with a welfare system designed to do more damage than good? Well, the first thing we can do is join organizations like Peel Poverty Action Group (PPAG) and fight like hell to better the system and our lives. Our collective strength is greater than that of any one individual. Second, we need to work with our partners in the labour movement to ensure that all jobs are good jobs with living wages. Together we can ensure that both the welfare system and the labour market provide economic security and dignity. Only then will we have a system that benefits the rest of us and not the rich.

Simon Black is completing a doctoral degree in political science at York University.

Happy Birthday, Rhonda

Rhonda Collis is a friend to just about every homeless or precariously-housed person in Brampton, plus everyone who has struggled to overcome addictions, or otherwise scraped the bottom of Peel's poverty barrel.

Her job as a community development worker brings her in contact with many individuals and families who are struggling. It's a job that has brought her many friends too, among her colleagues in Peel Health. And of course, there's always her family – husband Lorne, daughter Lisa, son Adam and his wife Marisa, and granddaughter Lillian.

Many of Rhonda's friends from all the walks of her life came together at Knights Table on May 2 to celebrate Rhonda's 60th birthday. There were all the regular customers of Knights Table which is Peel Region's only community kitchen serving free meals every day of the year, two Rhonda birthday cakes to include everybody in the revelry and a few speeches.

Rhonda grew up in the Kensington Market area of Toronto, quit school at 16 to work in clothing stores and score special rates on the latest fashions. At age 18, she married Lorne and they have been together ever since. Adam was born when Rhonda was 23, followed by Lisa at age 26.

Three years later, Rhonda went back to school – to York University in search of a BA in psychology. She's still looking for that elusive degree, because when she realized she was smart enough to make the Dean's List, reserved for top academic achievers, she dropped out of school again to work with the Family Education Centre of Peel, eventually becoming its executive director. The Education Centre first operated from Rhonda's house.

Later, she moved to North Brampton Community Connection which had free space in Peel Health offices. When Peel Health wanted a community development specialist, Rhonda took the job. That was 21 years ago, and she is still working at it.

This was a special birthday for Rhonda, not just because she turned 60. It was her first birthday party at Knights Table. Instead of gifts of flowers and goodies, Rhonda's friends made donations to Knights Table in Rhonda's name, bringing in more than $1,000 for hungry people.

BRAMALEA COMMUNITY HEALTH CENTRE

is pleased to announce a new initiative targeted at providing health care for those who are homeless in Brampton. This initiative is staffed by a Primary Care Nurse (Gary D) who will see people at various locations throughout Brampton and who will be based out of Bloom Clinic in downtown Brampton.

This program is funded by the Region of Peel and is offered in partnership with Knights Table and Regeneration House.

The average Bramptonian would likely be surprised at the number of residents in Brampton who are homeless and are in need of health care and other services that many of us take for granted. Homeless persons are numerous, carry a significant burden of illness and face challenges in accessing healthcare. It is difficult to describe with precision the health problems of homeless persons, in part because of the heterogeneity of this population across geographical regions. While there are limitations of outreach to people experiencing homelessness, research has shown that outreach improves health. The role of our the Homeless Outreach Nurse is one that builds a personal connection with the residents of Brampton that may play a role in helping the person improve his or her housing, health status, or social support network. The Homeless Outreach Nurse "meets people where they are". This means not only contacting people in non-traditional settings, but also meeting their need for connection, reassurance, and support through empathic listening, minimizing stereotyping, and providing greater choices. The basic needs of individuals are addressed to ensure survival on the streets.

Services currently provided in the Brampton community include:

- Assistance with chronic disease prevention and management (e.g. blood pressure, blood glucose)
- Treatment of wounds and injuries
- Assistance with forms
- Referral to emergency and mental health services

Bramalea
Community Health Centre

- Assistance with health system navigation
- Health teaching, counselling, and instrumental support
- Referral to community services such as food banks and shelters

An emphasis is placed on immediate care for acute issues, with a view that persons requiring more complex care can be successfully integrated into Bramalea Community Health Centre main site and the larger health care system.

Currently the Homeless Outreach Nurse provides these services throughout the Brampton community at the following locations:

- GRACE UNITED CHURCH
- THE KNIGHTS TABLE
